Note from the Chief Managing Editor

I am greatly pleased and honored to introduce the fourth, and final, issue of The University of the Pacific Law Review, Volume 50. This issue contains a compilation of articles based on presentations given by distinguished scholars at a symposium entitled “Blocking the Courthouse Door: Federal Civil Procedure Obstacles to Entry.” Also included in this issue are four student Comments addressing the unique topics of climate change litigation, the constitutionality of retaliatory arrests, spousal support, and domestic terrorism. These students invested a tremendous amount of time and effort into these Comments, while also balancing the rigorous demands of law school.

As the Chief Managing Editor, it is my job to oversee the editing of both student and professional articles. The editing process involves countless hours meticulously reviewing each article for style, grammar, punctuation, and citation errors as well as for substantive accuracy. Thanks to the perseverance, dedication, and strong writing abilities of my peers and fellow board members, Volume 50 serves as a testament to the exceptional and high-quality product that The University of the Pacific Law Review prides itself on.

Volume 50 of The University of the Pacific Law Review is a product of the tireless efforts of many individuals, without whom this issue would not have been possible. On behalf of the Volume 50 Board of Editors, I would like to thank all of the Staff Writers and Primary Editors for their exceptional hard work and dedication in editing and producing this issue. Thank you to our Chief Technical Editor, Emily Malhiot, for her unwavering support and tireless efforts in the editing and production process. Thank you to our Chief Articles & Symposium Editor, Michael Hopkins, for his dedication and insight into producing Volume 50. Lastly, immense thanks to our Editor-in-Chief, Libby Grotewohl, for her brilliance, patience, and leadership in overseeing UPLR. We would also like to extend our appreciation to the faculty and administration at McGeorge for their continued support and guidance.
