A Stage at McCaffrey?

Karla Cortez

The majority may not know this, but juniors and seniors may recall a stage that used to be located at the McCaffrey Center. This is due to the fact that, to the surprise of many, the stage was removed. Many students and members of the administration were not only puzzled to hear this news, but have since been attempting to bring back the McCaffrey Center stage; brand new and better than ever.

The process to draw attention to the interest and desire for the return of the stage has been frustrating for many individuals. This is understandable though, given the fact that the University of the Pacific is a large organization divided into many branches. Each with their own internal structures, quite similar to bureaucratic agencies, which must heed not only the interests of students, but also the advice of offices such as Student Life, Risk Management, Housing and Greek Life, Physical Plant and many more.

One can only agree that certain questions must be addressed, in the words of Jason Velo, Director of Student Life, "Who makes those determinations? Who gets notified? How was it planned? How was it notified?"

"We've got other facilities that were higher priorities... The McCaffrey stage was removed after a request by Pacific's Ambassadors to the stage for orientation during the summer of 2009. According to the University of the Pacific's Office of Risk Management, "Removal of the McCaffrey stage was authorized by Risk Management due to rusted bolts, rotten wood and soft spots that could give way underfoot."

In an interview with Rich Rojo, Executive Director of Marketing, and Steve Jacobsen, the Assistant Vice President for Residential Living, Rojo stated, "I think it's possible that because it was a safety issue the work just got done, you know, without a dialogue process... and given the same situation again I'm not so sure we would change that..."

Rojo also commented, that "once it deteriorated to a certain point they said that repairs aren't going to work anymore, we're just going to have to take it down. So I don't think it was that much of an issue of putting a lot of resources into it over the years. I think they kept it up as long as they could."

Speaking to the stage's slow deterioration, which according to Velo, "was a flimsy design to begin with," requests to repair the McCaffrey Center stage were submitted quite often, "The Student Activities Department would always resubmit every year, annually, to redo the wooden steps because the screws would come undone and it'd be kind of messed up," said Velo.

So the question may be asked of why there was never any conversation previously to the stage's complete deterioration. Rojo replied saying, "We've got other facilities that were higher priorities... they had to remove the hazardous condition here, but it didn't mean that it would be up in the maintenance cue."

Once a building on campus is deemed hazardous it must go down, but what an individual can see as a simple problem of a lack of dealing with a repetitive issue is a lot more complicated. For the plans of a new stage to
In Remembrance of Professor Nyberg

This winter, former Pacific Professor Emeritus Walter L. Nyberg, Ph.D. died of congestive heart failure at his home in Aptos, California. He was 89 years old.

Professor Nyberg was born in Minneapolis on November 20, 1922 but spent most of his life outside of the City of Lakes. In 1942, he joined the Navy and served during war years until 1946.

Retired Pacific Professor Larry Meredith, whose office was just across the hall from Nyberg’s in Sears Hall, saw photos of Nyberg during his naval days. “We saw pictures of him in his Navy uniform,” Meredith said. “He was a movie star handsome.”

Professor Nyberg continued his education at Boston University School of Theology where he received his Bachelors of Sacred Theology and Masters of Sacred Theology. He later earned his Ph.D. at New York University.

In 1952, Professor Nyberg started teaching in the Religious Studies Department of the University of the Pacific. He taught classes on the Psychology of Religion, the Bible, and Religious Education at Pacific for 29 years.

Though some students didn’t take to his direct teaching style, Professor Nyberg received many course evaluations praising his teaching ability. After leaving Pacific, Nyberg often returned to the campus.

“He used to come to campus from time to time, especially for the Collier lectures,” current Pacific Professor and Chair George Randels said.

In addition to his scholarly pursuits, Professor Nyberg was a Methodist minister, a Marriage and Family Counselor and a hypnotherapist. He was remembered for his passion for singing, affinity for reading, involvement in the community, and his welcoming presence.

Professor Nyberg was also known for his family life. He was married to Ruth Brewer Whitney for 66 years. According to Meredith, Nyberg’s love for his wife stood out above all things.

“The main thing, he absolutely adored his wife,” Meredith said. “He respected her. You could just see it.”

Professor Nyberg is survived by his wife, his four children, his six grandchildren and four great grandchildren.

“At the memorial just a week ago, his son said I thought my father was a great man,” Meredith explained. “That was Waht.”

Juan Cole
Speaks at Pacific on Arab Springs

George Do
CONTRIBUTING WRITER

On Friday, January 20th, the School of International Studies welcomed Juan Cole, a professor of history at the University of Michigan and an expert of Middle Eastern and Western relations, as part of the Distinguished Lecture Series. The purpose of the lecture was to bring in information about international issues that may not be a part of Pacific’s regular curriculum.

One of the coordinators, Maya Campbell, attributes part of seeking Cole for a lecture due to “students’ interest in the Middle East” as well as “the prominence of that region in the news lately.”

Cole’s talk featured the contemporary revolutions that occurred this previous year in the Arab world. Known collectively as the Arab Spring, people from oppressive regimes have decided to rise against their national governments to remove the political leaders responsible for the mistreatment. Revolutions have surfaced in Tunisia, Egypt, Libya, Yemen, Bahrain, and Syria.

Juan Cole describes this chain of revolutions as an example of a butterfly effect, where a seemingly small event can cause drastic changes. The origins of the Arab Spring can be traced to a young demonstrator in Tunisia, Mohamed Bouazizi, who lit himself on fire in protest to his local officials who prevented him from working and supporting his family. News of this demonstration and its reaction by the President spread throughout the countryside and escalated into a march upon the capitol, Tunis. The military turned its back on the president leading to the displacement of Ben Ali. The people of Tunisia succeeded.

News of Tunisia’s advances spread across the world. This inspired other citizens to rise against their own oppressive regimes. The effects would lead to the overthrowing of the governments in Egypt and Libya. Conflicts within Yemen, Bahrain, and Syria are still being contested. Juan Cole attributes the relative successes in the various countries to the “actions of the national militia.” Tunisia and Egypt did not feature national militia attacking the protesters while the other four did feature this.

“The global ramifications of the work of the protesters are not as significant as they may seem,” says Juan Cole. The people’s revolutions are great for local politics, but there are little worldwide effects that have emerged. The Arab world may be “run better”, but the trade routes and country to country diplomatic matters would seem to not jeopardize any serious priorities for the trade partners of the Arab world.

The effect may be inspirational for others around the world to change their individual governments, but for now, the world moves on as the Arab world tries to find out what it wants to be.

Last week a massive blackout took place across the internet. Major websites like Wikipedia and Reddit went dark in protest of two pieces of legislation, SOPA and PIPA. Google’s front page had a link to a petition to stop these two bills and gain 4.5 million signatures. The Internet had spoken, and it spoke loudly. Senators, Representatives and the White House have run away from the bill after outrage from the Internet alongside companies like Google, Facebook, and Twitter. What SOPA and PIPA would do is shut down websites that had just one single bit of copyrighted content on it. It requires very little evidence in terms of proving that there’s pirated content on a site.

This greatly effects content sites such as YouTube, and Reddit. Social networking sites that often include the sharing of links can also be taken down. This bill will increase self-censorship tenfold. Due to this more and more people will be less likely to start up their own websites or create their own content. People uploading a video of themself covering a song can face up to five years in jail. Another giant problem with the bill is that it would effect sites beyond the United States. The Department of Justice can block sites outside of the United States and its actual jurisdiction.

While piracy is indeed a problem this bill is more about censorship than it is protecting copyright. The way to stop piracy isn’t by censoring content on the internet and throwing people in jail for downloading a song. Video games are also the subject of piracy and many different game companies have tried to stop it. Ubisoft forces people to install Digital Rights Management software on their computer when they purchase their games. Gabe Newell, CEO and co-founder of Valve, a highly successful video game company also created the most popular digital distribution service for video games. Many PC gamers buy their games from this service. So this makes Gabe and Valve a huge victim of piracy because its all enacted online.

Gabe Newell said this about piracy in an interview with the University of Cambridge’s school newspaper: “We think there is a fundamental misconception about piracy. Piracy is almost always a service problem and not a pricing problem,” he said. “If a pirate offers a product anywhere in the world, 24/7, purchasable from the convenience of your personal computer, and the legal provider says the product is region-locked, will come to your country 3 months after the US release, and can only be purchased at a brick and mortar store, then the pirate’s service is more valuable.”

There is proof behind what he is saying, when Steam was about to expand to Russia, many people said it wasn’t a good idea because everyone would pirate their products. Now Russia is on the verge of being Steam’s biggest market in Europe.

This service argument goes for other industries as well. While Netflix includes many TV shows and movies, you can’t get the most recent episode or movie on Netflix, but you can pirate it without having to sit in a movie theater for two hours. As University of Pacific students the Bradford software prevents us from pirating on campus, I know several students that have pirated a variety of items outside of campus. This is all because piracy is a better service than anything else whether its Steam, iTunes, or Netflix. Until companies stop trying to prevent piracy through forcing buyers to add software to their computer or restricting their product; piracy will not be stopped. Provide a better service and people will go to it.

Another aspect of this piracy issue has to do with the website thepiratebay. org brought up in their press release: “Over a century ago Thomas Edison got the patent for a device which would ‘do for the eye what the phonograph does for the ear.’ He called it the kinetoscope. He was not only amongst the first to record video, he was also the first person to own the copyright to a motion picture. Because of Edison’s patents the motion pictures it was close to financially impossible to create motion pictures in the North American east coast. The movie studios therefore relocated to Calif., and founded what we today call Hollywood. The reason was because there was no patent. There was also no copyright to speak of, so the studios could copy old stories and make movies out of them - like Fantasia, one of Disney’s biggest hits ever.” This means that the current entertainment industry today is simply angry that different websites are now doing the exact thing they did in the past. They are largely own their monopolies but it’s crumbling from within.

Now companies buying off our Senators and Congressmen to protect their monopolies and censures the Internet. However, the Internet has fought back and after SOPA and PIPA being shelved. The Internet is the last bastion of relative free speech and the greatest method of creating content. The TV and the radio have been monopolized and now the MPAA, RIAA, and the ESA are all seeking to make sure that they can spread content how ever they please and by the rules they made for themselves after breaking the others in the past. Piracy is a problem, but Internet censorship is even worse.

Is Ron Paul the Best Candidate for You?

Carrie Fung
CONTRIBUTING WRITER

As each Republican primary/caucus passes us by, we see more and more “survival of the fittest” tactics at work. The pack has thinned out quite a bit since the debates started mid-2011, and soon we’ll be left with just one candidate. Rick Santorum won in Iowa by just a sliver, Mitt Romney had a win in New Hampshire by a solid 16.5% ahead of Ron Paul, and New Gingrich won the most recent primary in South Carolina by 12% of the votes. Though we haven’t seen any repeat wins yet, Romney has clearly put himself in the lead, winning in New Hampshire and earning second in both Iowa and South Carolina.

Last Thursday, Rick Perry decided to drop out of the race for the Republican Presidential nomination and endorse Newt Gingrich. Even though I’m a bit disappointed he didn’t endorse Ron Paul, I have to say it was about time he dropped out of the race. I thought Perry would have followed Jon Huntsman out, but I guess not. We all know it’s only a matter of time before all the weaker (less funded) options are weeded out, there was and is one man that stands determined to continue despite getting the GOP nomination: Dr. Ron Paul. Whether you’re Republican or not, you have to admit that Paul has some pretty interesting stances.

Paul is anti-government controlled education. Student loan debt is on the minds of students all over campus; mine included. Ron Paul suggests that we tear our education like our phones and computers. Have the marketplace there to create competition. In turn, Paul believes the quality of education will go up, and prices will come down. I’m not too familiar with economics, but anything seems like a better idea than what we’re doing now. But even if the student loan program and the Department of Education are approved to be eliminated, it would be years before any of us would see any real changes.

Paul is anti-war. He doesn’t believe the United States has any moral authority to run the world and play a global police. Unlike Gingrich who avoided the draft and did not serve our country, Paul served in the US Air Force and the Texas Air National Guard during most of the 1960’s. It’s refreshing to see someone who has spoken about the need to get out of other countries’ business, and bring our soldiers home. It’s also refreshing to know that the Paul campaign has raised the more money from military personal than any of the other Republican candidates combined. These soldiers could be our brothers, our sisters, our spouses, our high school friends, or just a guy that looks a bit familiar but you can’t really place where you met him. Having them home would not only take them out of direct danger, but it would also save the country a lot of money. Since 2001, the US has spent about $1,300,000,000,000 on wars alone.

Paul is against the war on drugs. He doesn’t promote recreational drug use, but believes individuals have the right to choose for themselves. Today, illegal drug possession can land you extensive jail time as well as a fine. Instead of treating marijuana users as big time criminals, Paul wants to investigate elected officials in Washington. Oaklanders, our sisters, our spouses, our high school friends, or just a guy that looks a bit familiar but you can’t really place where you met him. Having them home would not only take them out of direct danger, but it would also save the country a lot of money. Since 2001, the US has spent about $1,300,000,000,000 on wars alone.

Paul is anti-SOPA (Stop Online Piracy Act). What would freedom be without a free Internet? On another note, the media hasn’t paid much attention to Ron Paul. The Internet has dramatically with his run for candidacy. Sites like Ron Paul Flix and Blue Republican have gone a long way in spreading awareness via the Internet. With SOPA, Ron Paul Flix would be taken down in a heart beat, since it’s sole purpose is to post and share content. Mention Machine shows Paul being tweeted about more than his opponents Gingrich, Romney, Santorum, and even President Obama. With SOPA in effect, it wouldn’t just hurt the large number of Ron Paul supporters online, but all American citizens.

You’re probably thinking that some of Paul’s political stances aren’t very conservative. You know, despite being dubbed as the father of the Tea Party and all. Well, that’s because Paul is considered a conservative libertarian. For the 1988 presidential election, Paul actually ran as a libertarian. He finished right behind the Democratic candidate Michael Dukakis, and our former President George H.W. Bush. With the two party system, Paul was forced to chose the party he affiliates more with.

Even though the ticket may say ‘Republican,’ Ron Paul supporters come from many different parties and hold a vast variety of ideologies. Take the Blue Republicans for example. On their website, they describe themselves as “people who have never before thought of joining the Republican party, but are going to do so for one year to ensure that Ron Paul wins the Republican nomination for President in 2012.” This is mostly for those living in closed primary states like California, where only those registered with the affiliated party can vote during primaries. Of course, it wouldn’t hurt for everyone to change their party anyway. This really shows how passionate people are for Ron Paul, and what he stands for. I guess people are just tired of big government taking away their liberties. Democrats, Progressives, Centrists, Libertarians! For those of you considering joining the GOP for a year to help Ron Paul, the registration deadline here in California is May 21st.

Doing so will ensure your ability to vote Republican for our primary on June 5th. I feel like such a defeatist saying this, but I doubt Paul will be able to secure the GOP nomination. And if all he decides to go for the write in, it might give President Obama the edge to secure a second term. Despite finishing a sad fourth in South Carolina, Paul has decided to push forward. His perseverance and optimism are nothing less than admirable. As for now, it’s off to Florida. Mark your calendars for January 31, because it is sure to be another close race.
Students Return From Their Alternative Break Experience

Erin Haley
CONTRIBUTING WRITER

University of the Pacific’s Center for Community Involvement (CCI) is located in a small, unobtrusive house in the Tenderloin and Chinatown. Prior to the trip, the students met on a weekly basis to learn and discuss homelessness and poverty. Only slightly secondary was the chance to experience a small level of poverty. The students took public transportation to and from the city, stayed at a church and had limited food to last them the four days they were in San Francisco.

There were several locations at which the students volunteered. At Project Open Hand they helped other volunteers to prepare food that would combine to make 2,500 meals for delivery to individuals who are home-bound following surgeries, or due to age and infirmity. The next day took them to St. Anthony’s Foundation to serve and bus meals to around 3,000 individuals. Following the service, the group was fortunate to have a small discussion with a member of St. Anthony’s alcohol recovery program. The speaker was open and vulnerable, discussing his experiences, losses, and path of recovery. Members of the all-male recovery program are required to volunteer at St. Anthony’s in some capacity.

Single room occupancy (SRO) buildings are quite common in San Francisco. They are 8ft x 10ft rooms that sometimes house up to 3 generations. There are two common kitchens on each floor and several bathrooms which are shared by the residents. The Pacific students helped to clean a portion of the common areas for one SRO in Chinatown. (Don’t worry - the bathrooms were off limits!). Following this they were taken on the Chinatown Alleyway Tour and learned about the development of a unique and historical section of San Francisco.

Finally, the students volunteered at Glide, a non-denominational organization serving individuals in need. Those who have seen the movie “The Pursuit of Happyness” may recognize this as the place in which Will Smith’s character stayed when he was temporarily homeless. Here, the students again served breakfast in the dining areas, serving approximately 1,000 meals.

A compact and enlightening experience that broadened the perspectives and comfort zone of all who participated, SFAB provided safe yet realistic exposure to what it is like to experience poverty and to give back to community. A similar trip will be hosted next year. Though it is too late to sign up for this year’s trip, both of these events are scheduled to happen next year.

The Hunger Games Leaves Readers Hungry For More

Ruben Dominguez
SPORTS EDITOR

Knowing that, on March 23rd, the film adaptation of Suzanne Collins' The Hunger Games will hit theaters nationwide, potential moviegoers will want to find about the novel that started it all. Set several centuries in the future in the territory once known as North America, The Hunger Games is focused in the nation of Panem, comprised of the shining, glorious Capitol city and its twelve surrounding districts, which supply the capital with everything from food to lumber to fancy wristwatches. There was originally a thirteenth district. However, when the Capitol fought back a rebellion from the districts, District 13 was destroyed to set an example for the other districts, which have become ridden with poverty and despair.

As a result of the rebellion, the Capitol created the Hunger Games as a way to remind the districts of the power and control over them. Once a year, each district must send one boy and one girl, both between the ages of twelve and eighteen, to compete in the Games, a literal fight to the death, with the last person standing receiving enough fortune to live a luxurious life.

The story begins in District 12, supplier of the Capitol, a sixteen-year-old daughter of a miner killed in an explosion, preparing for Reaping Day (the day where the contestants from each districts are chosen) with her friend and male hunting partner Gale Hawthorne. Despite the incredible odds against it happening, Katniss' younger sister, twelve-year-old Primrose, is chosen to be twelfth, whereas Katniss, in a desperate attempt to spare her sister's life, volunteers to take her sister's place in the 74th Hunger Games. If that weren't enough, Katniss has a secret history with the chosen male contestant, Peeta Mellark, the son of the district baker.

Now, Katniss and Peeta, along with the drunken Haymitch Abernathy, the duo's mentor and District 12's only living previous winner of Hunger Games, must travel to the Capitol, where they will be in a world of luxury, opportunity, and corruption. While at the Capitol, Katniss and Peeta must deal with intense scrutiny under the Capitol's watchful eye, all preparing for what is quite literally the fight for their lives. The two must work together in order to not step out of line, deal with moral struggles of life and love, and train for the battles ahead if they can survive that, there are the Games themselves. If Katniss and Peeta want to make it back home alive, they must push each other to the brink in order to survive the Hunger Games.

It becomes apparent that readers must save the novel for a time when they have about five hours to spare. This is because, once you start reading, it is almost impossible to put it down. The story is told in first person through Katniss' point of view. Collins mixes dialogue with thoughts and actions, making for a fast-paced style of reading. Instantly, you imagine yourself in Katniss' place, hunting to provide for your poor family, seeing your sister chosen for certain death, viewing the magnificent Capitol for the first time, questioning your definitions of right and wrong, struggling to understand your feelings, and trying to survive when twenty three other people your age are trying to kill you. All of the sudden, you look up and see that five hours have gone by and you've turned to page 294.

Something which readers are constantly reminded of is the sheer power that the district holds over its citizens. The citizens of the Capitol press three buttons on a delicious filet mignon app before they eat: or a serum filled with bubbles from different soaps is filled while they're getting the remnants of soap out of the hair around their face. The districts try to chance this thing. Certainly, Collins takes readers to films like Running Man, series 7, and The Condemed and novels as 1984, The Walk, and California Trilogy in presenting the novel's post-apocalyptic, tyrannical, controlling government, one which prohibits any form of free speech.

Suzanne Collins creates characters that touch readers. Readers sympathize with Katniss' conflicting emotions; are awared by Peeta's immense kindness and compassion; and become anguished at the Capitol for oppressing its citizens. Suspense, dramatic action, and surprise are all in store for anyone who sees this story to the end. Indeed, readers who finish Hunger Games (quite frankly, no one who wouldn't want to finish The Hunger Games) are left wanting more. Collins' will to survive evokes a spark that might make another rebellion catch fire?

Sun Goddess: Vitamin D

Alexandra Caspero
CAMPUS DIETITIAN

Quiz time. What is the only vitamin that you don't have to get from food? If your guessed Vitamin D, you're right! This important vitamin (actually a hormone) has been getting a lot of media buzz lately for its role in cancer prevention, bone growth, mood disorders, and bone health. Are you getting enough? Read below for 2 must-know facts about vitamin D.

1. We already noted that you CAN get vitamin D from the sun. However, most of us don't during winter months. We live too far north to be able to make enough Vitamin D from just being outside.

2. There are a lot of barriers to vitamin D production: air pollution, sunscreen, and the time of day. Generally, the best time to get Vitamin D is when the sun is highest, from 10AM-2PM in the summer months. However, those are also the times of day that the sun is the most powerful.

The bottom line: Your probably not getting enough Vitamin D if you rely only on the sun. Good food sources: fortified milk and cereals, salmon, tuna, egg yolks and supplements.

Pacific Dominates Big West Foe UC Davis
Rivera Leads Team in Scoring and Rebounding as Tigers Use Defense to Cruise to 64-48 Win

Pacific defeated UC Davis 64-48 on Saturday, Jan. 21 in the Spanos Center. The Tigers improved to 6-12 on the season, 2-4 in Big West Conference play. UC Davis dropped to 1-17, 0-6 in league play.

"It was important for us to win at home tonight and we did a great job defensively," said Pacific head coach Bob Thomason. "I don't think we could have played harder or better in the first half, we just didn't shoot the ball well."

Pacific scored the first four points to set the tone for the game, as the Tigers would not trail in the contest. The Aggies evened the game to 10-10, six minutes into the half, but a pair of three-pointers by juniors Travis Fulton and Markus Duran gave Pacific a 16-10 lead.

UCD's Eddie Miller answered with a three-pointer, but the Tigers pushed the lead to eight (21-13) after five straight points on a jumper from sophomore Ross Rivera and three free throws. A short 5-2 segment cut Pacific's lead to 21-16. The Tigers turned up the defense in the late moments of the first half, holding the Aggies scoreless over the final 5:16 of the first half. Pacific finished the half on a 7-0 run to lead 30-18.

Junior Lorenzo McCloud hit a three-pointer to open the second half as the Tigers lead stayed in double figures for the remainder of the game. Junior Rodrigo De Souza (30) attempts a shot over two Aggie defenders.

Pacific scored the first four points to set the tone for the game, as the Tigers would not trail in the contest. The Aggies evened the game to 10-10, six minutes into the half, but a pair of three-pointers by juniors Travis Fulton and Markus Duran gave Pacific a 16-10 lead.

UCD's Eddie Miller answered with a three-pointer, but the Tigers pushed the lead to eight (21-13) after five straight points on a jumper from sophomore Ross Rivera and three free throws. A short 5-2 segment cut Pacific's lead to 21-16. The Tigers turned up the defense in the late moments of the first half, holding the Aggies scoreless over the final 5:16 of the first half. Pacific finished the half on a 7-0 run to lead 30-18.

Junior Lorenzo McCloud hit a three-pointer to open the second half as the Tigers lead stayed in double figures for the remainder of the game. The Aggies used a 7-2 run to cut the lead to 10 (35-25) with 13:14 to play in the game. A 9-1 spurt by Pacific featuring four points from Fulton pushed the lead back to 44-26 three minutes later.

UC Davis cut it back to a 12 point game (46-34) after an 8-2 run, but the Tigers pulled away from there. Five points each from Duran and Rivera in a 13-5 stretch gave the Tigers a 20 point lead (59-39) and the lead would not fall below 16 the rest of the way.

Rivera led the Tigers with 19 points, grabbing a team-best nine rebounds. Duran added 17 points, hitting five three-pointers while Fulton scored 13 for Pacific.

The Tigers won despite shooting just 36.7 percent from the field. Strong defense held UC Davis to an opponent season-low of 48 points, 34.0 percent shooting from the field and forced 14 turnovers. Pacific outscored UCD 24-8 in points off of turnovers. Miller was the only Aggie in double figures with 12 points.
