Special Commentary On Legislative Action For Environmental Protection

Within the last five years, man's abuse of his environment has been a central issue of debate in legislative hearings at every level of government throughout the United States. The articles included in this section depart significantly from the traditional law review style; however, the board of editors of the Pacific Law Journal, after considering the magnitude of the problems resulting from environmental pollution have included these materials in the belief they will provide some stimulating thought and introspective analysis of past attitudes and conduct of our law makers. An article responding to Messrs. McCloskey's and Zierold's article was scheduled to be included in this issue; however the author failed to submit a completed manuscript to the Board of Editors.
