Note from the Chief Managing Editor

It is my honor to present the second issue of University of the Pacific Law Review (UPLR), Volume 55! The annual UPLR symposium issue is a tradition at our journal, and the topic this year is especially pertinent. Recent technological advances—from artificial intelligence to social media—have raised many poignant free speech issues. It is essential that our society continue to confront the legal implications of such advances. We hope this issue presents the necessarily varied, global framework in which to contemplate these issues. I am extremely grateful to our incredible contributors for their hard work addressing these important and challenging concepts. Thank you for sharing your invaluable time, energy, and opinions with us.

A great congratulations and a heartfelt thank you to everyone who makes the UPLR possible. Thank you so much to my amazing primary editors—Jes Thompson, Tara Swanson, Kyndall Banales, Devynn Azevedo, and Fara Rodriguez. You all have been so dedicated to this process and I couldn't do it without you! And to my fellow Board members: it has been such an honor and a blessing to work with each and every one of you. You are hard-working, passionate, kind, and an all-around exceptional group of people. I couldn't have asked for a better team, and I cannot wait to see where your legal careers take you.

Finally, thank you to our readers. We hope you find this issue as informative and inspiring as we do. Enjoy!
