Editor's Note

With this issue, the Pacific Law Journal is for the first time typesetting its pages in-house, on a new state-of-the-art desktop publishing system. This system will enable the Pacific Law Journal to publish all future issues on time, and to incorporate up to the minute changes in the law in the articles and comments we publish. Due to the drastically decreased preparation and printing time of future issues, we feel that this development will prove advantageous to authors who have written especially timely articles which require immediate publication.

There are numerous individuals who have been instrumental in implementing this system. While the system will save us much time and labor in producing subsequent issues, the initial conversion to the new system was quite labor-intensive. Many of us have been forced to spend long hours effectuating this conversion. The most significant contributions of time, energy, and knowledge were made by the Managing Department of the Pacific Law Journal: Gilbert Khachadourian, the Managing Editor; Kevin Iams, the Assistant Managing Editor; and, in particular, Jonathan Christianson, the Associate Managing Editor. We also owe a debt of gratitude to the Volume 22 Comment Staff and Legislative Review Staff for their cooperation and understanding during a very trying period. Our efforts have also been facilitated by the cooperation and advice offered by the Board of Editors of McGeorge's journal of international law, The Transnational Lawyer, particularly Victor Gallo, the Editor in Chief. And, of course, this project would not have been possible without the cooperation, encouragement, and generous financial support of the administration of the McGeorge School of Law and the University of the Pacific.

Through the use of this system and other efforts and improvements, we are committed to maintaining and improving the quality of the Pacific Law Journal. Toward that end, we welcome the comments, criticisms, and suggestions of our subscribers and other readers. We hope to hear from you.
