Note from the Chief Managing Editor

It is with great pleasure that I introduce the fourth, and last, issue of The University of the Pacific Law Review, Volume 48. This issue contains a compilation of articles based on presentations given by distinguished scholars at a panel titled Socio-Economics of Law School Pedagogy. Also included is an article discussing California venue and choice of law in employment contract provisions. Last, but not least, I am thrilled to introduce two student Comments included in this issue. These two students not only wrote on unique topics, but also relentlessly edited their drafts in order to present outstanding contributions to legal scholarship.

As the Chief Managing Editor, it is my job to organize and oversee the production schedule and the editing of all articles. In addition to requiring managerial skills, the position warrants a hypersensitive attention to detail and thorough understanding of The Bluebook and Bryan Garner's The Redbook. Law school pedagogy plays a direct role in the ability to do my job. Without the commitment of each professor in my legal education, I would not have the skills required to produce the caliber of work Volume 48 prides itself on.

Accordingly, I, along with the staff members, primary editors, and my fellow Board Members of Volume 48, would like to dedicate this issue to the professors of The University of the Pacific, McGeorge School of Law. We attend this institution because of your steadfast efforts to teach us what the law is, how to practice the law, and how to contribute to the profession. The greatest advantage we have is the wisdom you have imparted to us. It is through you, and because of you, that we endeavor to become pillars in the legal community. At a time where it is more important than ever to uphold and defend the law, we hope to make you proud by doing so and we are endlessly thankful for sharing your passion with us.

As I reflect on Volume 48, I am filled with so much gratitude. To the staff writers, primary editors, and Board of Editors: none of this would have been possible without you and it is difficult to convey how much I appreciate you. We at The University of the Pacific Law Review, Volume 48, are a family, and we would not be the family we are today without each and every one of you. It has been an honor and a privilege to work with you, learn from you, and know you.
